Garibaldi took the title of Dictator in the name of Victor Emmanuel. King Francis, it is thought, should have taken the stronger course, defied Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi alike, and appealed to Austria. Actually he did the worst thing possible; he granted a Constitution and formed a ministry of liberals, wishing to conciliate both France and Great Britain. It is clear that Napoleon strongly disliked the union of South Italy to the already overgrown kingdom, as it seemed to him, of North Italy, and to pose as a Constitutionalist was to make a bid for French help. But twice already had a King of Naples granted a Constitution when under the influence of fear, and twice had it been set aside when the cause for fear had departed. There was no security that Francis would be more inclined to keep his word than his father or grandfather had been. His one chance was to make proper use of his regular army, 100,000 strong in all and containing some good Swiss mercenary regiments. Palermo had been lost ingloriously, but the Neapolitan force in Sicily was yet strong and, when concentrated on the straits, could easily prevent Garibaldi from reaching Messina and thence crossing to the mainland. But the...
